Millennials are educated. They know that advertising leads to dissatisfaction with brand products. The advertising industry, which is largely non-transparent, is widely accused of manipulating consumers. For instance, an advertisement for a certain brand of jeans may contain only certain pieces of information which suggests that purchasing the jeans can lead to greater happiness and thus more sales. However, what does the “selling” actually mean? 1) Should brands make implicit, non-transparent claims in their advertisements? Why or why not? 2) What are consumers’ rights to advertisements? How much of their privacy should brands respect? 3) If someone is anonymous, but personally identifiable, how can people make an informed decision about whether to buy something? 4) What limits should brands put on “employees” who market products? 5) Should people who work in media – bloggers, journalists, etc. – be paid a fair wage and be transparent about their sources of income? 6) Who is responsible for what people do and say online? Online advertisers, social networks, hosting companies, search engines, and search engine providers, such as Google, have all the power to determine what can and cannot be seen online. Why we need it? People are starting to complain about a “marketing apocalypse” in which everything is taken over by marketers. Unfortunately, the majority of new media platforms are still controlled by one or two companies and the more powerful people who control them. As a result, the public’s choices are reduced and they are more likely to accept what has been sold to them. Furthermore, while more and more consumers understand the power of these advertising companies, they can’t do anything about it. Risk It’s hard to know how much the public can do about advertising and whether it can make a difference, but if we are to look at other areas in our lives we can see that advertising works. It influences our physical and psychological lives, how we live, and what we buy and whom we vote for. Some people argue that trying to stop all advertising is unethical because it would hurt the “whole” economy. However, marketing is not a magical force that cannot be stopped. It is one piece of a much larger system. If marketers are more ethical, then all parts of that system will be more ethical. You must know how to play in the New World. How to search the Internet in Google? Here is the 77a5ca646e
